SAN DIEGO — San Diego is planning a crackdown on abandoned vehicles that will shrink the amount of time it typically takes to remove them from roughly seven weeks down to just six days. Abandoned vehicles — cars and trucks left in the same on-street parking spot for more than 72 hours — are the No. 1 complaint the city gets from residents through phone calls and the Get it Done! tipster app. The volume of complaints, which averages more than 4,500 a month, means residents now wait somewhere between 45 and 60 days for a city response. The city's stated goal is to respond within three days and then tow the car three days later. The campaign, which is scheduled to begin this summer, is part of Mayor Todd Gloria's increasing focus on quality-of-life issues that have frustrated residents for many years. He also hopes to address more quickly pothole repairs, missed trash pick-ups, streetlight repairs, traffic signal repairs, sidewalk problems, weed abatement and tree maintenance, officials said. Abandoned cars are a big issue in San Diego's more residential and suburban neighborhoods, because the lack of parking meters and no-parking zones means there is essentially zero parking enforcement there. Many residents get frustrated when a car or truck they don't own is parked in front of their home for several days without being moved. David Moty, a longtime neighborhood leader in Kensington and Talmadge, said Friday that abandoned cars often make residents highly frustrated. "Sometimes a car is there for two weeks and they finally realize it's just not going away," he said. Councilmember Chris Cate said complaints about abandoned cars have consistently been among the problems his staff has dealt with the most since he was elected in 2014. The city's plan calls for doubling the number of employees devoted to the problem — from six to 12 — and buying half a dozen new enforcement vehicles for Police Department code compliance officers. City officials acknowledge that doubling staff might not be enough to immediately solve such a large problem. "Because we are starting with such slow response times, it remains to be seen how much progress five additional code compliance officers will get us," said Kirby Brady, the city's chief innovation officer. Brady said it would be fair to characterize as "aspirational" the goal of shrinking responses to six days for abandoned car reports. "We asserted these very aspirational service levels knowing that it may take a few years to get there," she said. "I think that's the best way to do it. We're saying this is what the standard should be, let's figure out what it's going to take to get there." Brady said city staff may also discover new approaches that help shorten response times without adding more personnel. For example, an option was added last year to Get it Done! to allow people to cancel an abandoned car complaint when the car gets removed, helping code officers avoid making hundreds of unnecessary trips. Cate praised Gloria for prioritizing quality-of-life issues and for taking a data-driven approach. But he noted that San Diego often struggles to hire enough people to fill new jobs the city creates. "It's not as easy as saying we're going to throw a bunch of cash at the problem," said Cate, stressing that there is a big difference between funding a position and actually filling a position. The city's independent budget analyst has raised similar concerns about Gloria's plans to quickly address quality-of-life issues, which are included in a budget document released in November called a five-year outlook. "The outlook contemplates the creation of hundreds of new positions in departments that already have high vacancy levels," the independent budget analyst wrote. "If the reasons behind high vacancy rates are not addressed, simply adding positions may not significantly increase service levels." The city's plan will cost $720,000 the first year and $480,000 in subsequent years. Costs will be higher the first year because the city must buy five new code enforcement vehicles. Some of those costs might be offset by higher fine collections. The fine for an abandoned car is $53.50, plus any charges related to towing. Brady said her staff in the city's Performance and Analytics Department is focused on making life better for city residents. "We know parking is an important and scarce shared resource, so we really wanted to make sure that we were improving it as much as we could," she said. "This mayor has very high expectations and wants to provide core services in the way that residents are demanding. We're just trying to do better — airing our own dirty laundry and say how long it's taking us to do things." In addition to reporting abandoned vehicles on Get it Done!, the city accepts complaints at (619) 531-2000 or (858) 495-7856. San Diego — San Diego's popular smartphone tipster app Get it Done! has boosted abandoned vehicle reports the city receives to more than 3,000 a month, making it harder for parking enforcement officers to quickly handle them. While city officials hail Get it Done! for making it easier to report abandoned cars and other nuisances, they say it puts greater pressure on city resources by increasing the number of complaints in every category. City Councilman Chris Ward is proposing that San Diego increase its parking code compliance officers from five to eight to better handle the larger workload. Ward, whose district includes neighborhoods like Hillcrest and North Park, where parking scarcity is a problem, said the app could allow the city to more quickly and efficiently write tickets for abandoned vehicles. State law prohibits leaving a vehicle parked in the same spot for more than 72 hours, but the city's enforcement methods essentially allow such vehicles to remain in place for at least 144 hours before a citation is issued. That's because a resident can't complain of an abandoned vehicle until it has been in place for 72 hours, which is followed by enforcement officers issuing a warning ticket and then returning 72 hours later to see if the car is still there. Ward wants San Diego police, and possibly attorneys for the city, to research whether the initial app report by the resident, which includes a smartphone picture of the vehicle and a time and date, could serve as the starting time for the 72 hours. "This might take a little bit of study, but I'd like to see the Get it Done! report itself serve as the starting point for the 72 hours," Ward said. "The photo shows the positioning of the car as it exists at that point in time on a Tuesday, so by Friday an officer who goes out should have everything they need to issue a 72-hour ticket." Before the app was launched in May 2016, people could report abandoned cars on the city's website, by calling (619) 531-2000 or by notifying the office of the council member representing their neighborhood. The city had been receiving about 2,400 reports per month. Now the city gets about 3,000 reports per month on the app, in addition to reports received by the old methods. "As more people have become aware of the Get it Done app, it's become much easier to report," said Henish Pulickal, chairman of the Pacific Beach Community Planning Group. "It takes 30 seconds to take a picture of an abandoned vehicle and get it uploaded, versus trying to figure out how to report it, which was the case before." In February, abandoned cars resulted in 3,100 reports, second only to 5,300 reports of potholes. Last year, Ward said he was told by city officials that it sometimes takes as long as 21 days for the city to handle an abandoned vehicle report. Adding three parking code compliance officers would cost about $153,000 a year, Ward said in a budget request. Though that's a relatively small amount in a $3 billion annual budget, the city is facing projected deficits in coming years. There are clearly higher priorities for the city but Ward said he thinks it's appropriate to address this problem. "Parking is definitely a premium, especially in the urban core," he said. "We all need to be playing by the same rules. People parking cars and leaving them for an extended period is a lost opportunity for somebody else who is coming and going on a daily basis and needs access to neighborhood businesses or residents." He's also concerned about a recent problem that popped up in Bankers Hill, a mostly residential neighborhood just east of San Diego International Airport. People have begun parking their cars in the neighborhood and taking ride-hooking services like Uber or Lyft to the airport. "They are enjoying an $8 Uber ride instead of a much more expensive one from farther away from places like Rancho Bernardo, or paying about $12 a day to park at the airport," he said. "A neighborhood shouldn't have to sacrifice its supply of limited on-street parking because of the changing landscape of new technologies." Pulickal, the Pacific Beach community leader, said lax enforcement of the 72-hour rule isn't a significant problem in his neighborhood because parking meters and street sweeping restrictions keep parking enforcement relatively vigilant. Also, the word "abandoned" is a bit misleading, he said. "You don't see a lot of cases where someone is leaving their crappy car on the street because it doesn't run," he said. "It's usually more about someone being on vacation and not having a parking spot where they can leave their car." Leo Wilson, chairman of the Uptown Planning Group that covers Hillcrest, Bankers Hill and nearby areas, said he hasn't noticed significant enforcement delays since Get it Done! "In the past it already used to take some time, so I haven't noticed a difference," he said. "It takes a little bit of time, but I still think it's fairly reasonable." The city sometimes receives complaints that vehicle owners only move their vehicle a few feet to avoid citations under the 72-hour rule, but the city's website says a vehicle must be moved at least one-tenth of a mile to avoid a citation. david.garrick@suniontribune.com (619) 269-8906 Twitter: @UTDavidGarrick
